

Osaka University

Osaka, Japan

Osaka University was inaugurated as the sixth imperial university in Japan in 1931. It started with two faculties; medicine and science. The School of Engineering was added as a third faculty two years later.

Osaka Imperial University changed its name to Osaka University in 1947. In 1949, as a result of the government's education system reform, Osaka University started its postwar career with five faculties: science, medicine, engineering, letters and law. Although it is a national university, Osaka University was established in response to the requests of local industrial circles and citizens. This is reflected in the many faculties that were founded through the financing of voluntary contributors.
